MANAGER'S COMMENTS

MARKET OVERVIEW

After a strong start to the year, Asia ex-Japan equities saw heightened volatility in February triggered by a spike in US bond yields and rising expectations of further monetary tightening by the US Federal Reserve. India was the weakest with banking stocks leading the market lower, as an alleged fraud at state-controlled bank raised concern over the wider sector. Chinese equities were also down, with real estate and financial stocks among the weakest names, although macroeconomic data released during the month was broadly stable. The Taiwanese and Hong Kong markets held up better than the wider index but finished in negative territory. Thailand was the only index country to record a positive return driven by a strong rotation into its energy and utilities stocks.

In fixed income, Asian credit declined on the back of the spike in US Treasury yields coupled with the widening of credit spreads. The US Treasury 10 year yields increased from 2.7% to 2.9%, fuelled by further growth and inflation expectations. The market also moved to price a moderately faster pace of rate hikes in 2018, as new Fed Reserve Chair Jay Powell's testimony was taken as a more hawkish outlook on interest rates. Both Asian investment grade and high yield credits declined, with the former underperforming due to their higher sensitivity to rising bonds yields. Asian local currency bonds also fell on the back of the broad strengthening of the USD.

Over the month, the Singapore dollar fell by -1.0% against the US dollar.
